

The government prevented me from stopping tax avoidance

Published: January 12, 2026, 9:47 pm

Liberal Conspiracy →^a The government prevented me from stopping tax avoidance.

Michael Meaacher complains he could not promote the general anti- avoidance principle I wrote for him and the Lib Dems:

The need for a general anti-tax avoidance principle (GANTIP) to be enshrined in the British finance system is now overwhelming.

The totality of tax avoided by super-rich individuals and big corporations has been estimated by independent research at some £25bn a year, and even by the Treasury at up to £13bn a year.

At a time when Alistair Darling is seeking to cut the colossal £175bn black hole in the public accounts by £50bn, ending (or very substantially reducing) tax avoidance must feature as one of the most palatable options available. Yet once again as the Finance Bill returns to the floor of the House of Commons at committee stage, the Government has introduced no such GANTIP amendment.

That is all the more surprising since, ironically, the Government has been forced to put down a new clause to block a tax avoidance device which has only come to light since the Finance Bill was published. It simply reveals that however much HMRC attempt to stop up every loophole, it is a sisyphian task since new avoidance devices will rapidly appear to replace it, and it is a never-ending process.

Why then doesn't the Government stop it at its root?

To push this argument, I put down two months ago with the assistance of Richard Murphy, one of the country's tax experts and a radical reformer, a new clause to be debated in the Finance Bill committee stage.

It has not however been selected by the Speaker's office for debate on the grounds that the effect of the new clause would be to increase taxation (of course it would - that's the whole point of it!), but the Government has taken to itself the prerogative that only itself can increase taxes, so the new clause is ruled out of order!

Absurd, eh?

PS I note this blog also suffers from the libertarians