As the Guardian notes, the role of the Big Society in the sell of the Forestry Commission is a sham:

The vast majority of England's public woodland will be offered for sale to commercial businesses, the Guardian has learned from documents suggesting that only 1% will be acquired by communities and 2% by charities.

As I've previously noted, this is about commercial exploitation.

And maybe - given how important the issue is to a Cabinet of millionaires - about inheritance tax abuse.

Objectively, it is hard to see this as anything but the deliberate enclosure of forests for private benefit for the wealthy at cost to all the rest of us.

It's a perfect metaphor for the philosophy of this government in that sense.

No wonder this campaign is going to be very hard fought.
