

Strangely conflicted

I am in one sense I am pleased the UK is holding out against some aspects of the EU deal proposed by Merkel and Sarkozy. As I have argued, that deal is dire for democracy.

At the same time I loathe his reasoning - that puts the City of London at the core of concerns.

It leaves me strangely conflicted.

What is so obviously true is that with low interest rates, mass unemployment and a crisis of hopelessness sweeping Europe, whilst we know that at the same the environment is being trashed, the we need a Green New Deal for Europe.

And that such a Green New Deal for Europe has to reflect, respect and even encourage diversity within a framework of mutual respect on which we can all agree.

That's so far from what's on offer. No wonder the politicians in Brussels are failing.
