I just noticed this as a headline in an email from Financial Director magazine:

I wonder if they realise that for many people that would be all the evidence that they need that it might make sense for them? After all, this is the profession that took us to the brink of destruction on the basis of assumptions as to the way that the economy worked that nearly ruined us, despite which they have shown no sign of any greater wisdom since then.

In that case if I was undecided I might decide to vote the exact opposite way that any professional adviser suggested and think I'd probably got it right.
