This is from Paul Mason in the Guardian:

What we know already is that a significant number of Scottish people have a dream: where statehood, social justice and cultural self-confidence fit together into a clear and popular project.

My hope would be that this is not just a Scottish dream, but so far it has not crossed the border into England.

I wish it would, for this is not about crude nationalism. That oppresses in the end. This is about empowerment, and that's the exact opposite and precisely what we need.
