

Moderation

I have to make the point every now and today is one such day: there is a moderation policy on this blog. Amongst the things it says are:

The comment offered must be intended to develop the themes I am discussing. There are ample opportunities in a wide range of media for opposing the opinion I offer and you are welcome to use them. This blog is not one of those places. This blog is focussed on providing creative solutions to the tax and economic issues we face in the interests of all rather than a few. If your comment is not a constructive contribution to that process it may well be deleted.

Ignoring for a moment the people who write every day to say what a vile man I am (and there are some), there is also a regular stream of people (or a persistent stream of renamed individuals) who think they have the stunning insight that neoliberal economics works, the world works in accordance with its prescriptions (it does not describe, so the word description cannot be used) and that this is the place to say so.

It isn't.

And it's school holiday time and I have other and better demands on my time.

So zero tolerance is being applied to those who wish to boringly and repetitively point this out.
