

Nottingham, tonight

As I have previously noted on the blog I am in Nottingham tonight making a speech at Jeremy Corbyn's rally on those parts of his programme for which I have some responsibility. I note there are already more than 1,400 people saying they are coming.

As is my practice, I make clear that I will be doing so as an economist, and not as a politician, and as a person who has promoted ideas and not a political party, as evidenced by my willingness to work with politicians from quite a number of parties in recent years.

But I am looking forward to meeting those excited by the ideas now on offer. It is ordinary people demanding change that are projecting these ideas centre stage. It's humbling to think I might have played even a small part in that process.
