

Advice on a Masters in Economics please

Published: January 13, 2026, 12:35 am

---

The following question was mailed to me. I leave it to others to answer: I love discussing economics/political economy but I don't have any qualifications in this area. I have a PhD in English Literature but I almost wish I hadn't bothered. Were I to go back to uni to do an economics masters where would I go? I know you might want to advocate for your new university (City isn't it?) but London is a no-go for many people including myself. So which university offers enough of a rounded economics education - neo-classical to understand modern discourse, alternatives such as Keynesian, institutional, Austrian etc., some economic history, and some history of political economy ( for instance Physiocrats Smith, Ricardo, Marx, Marshall and so on) - to produce a graduate with enough flexibility of thought to make doing it worthwhile for a mature student who doesn't intend to join the economics rat race? The questioner is someone I know is serious. Please feel free to comment.