

Marching to an outcome no one wants

I had some sympathy with this, in the Guardian this morning:

On this occasion Juncker is right.

But of course, he's also ignoring the fact that they are his problem too, as hard Brexit would make them.

And that sometime, someone has to break the deadlock in the UK.

As it is it feels like the march to WW1 right now: we got an outcome no one wanted or really planned for because no-one would actually stop it happening.
