The FT has just published this in an email:

With Hinckley Point also in doubt, the UK's future energy policy is in tatters: the nuclear option is dead because it is technically and financially not feasible.

If ever there was a moment for us to be focussing on what is important in politics to announce a Green New Deal to solve this problem this would be it.

Instead we have Brexit stupidity.

The opportunity cost of our political paralysis is staggering. And one day we will deeply rue it.
