It was pretty wet in Aberystwyth this morning. So, with plenty to read and a couple of computers in tow I caught the train to Pwllheli just to have a cup of tea. More than six hours of train ride for £8.50 - and amazing views. Plus a train where the vast majority of train announcements were not in English - and nor was much of the conversation. Farage would have been deeply uncomfortable. I loved it. And I got the chance to take this:

Honestly, that is a colour photo. For the train buffs, it is Lyd heading for Porthmadog across the Cob at about 3pm this afternoon taken from the mainline train about a mile further north. Any fuzziness is down the quality of window cleaning by Trains for Wales.
