No one could think Sebastian Payne, who writes for the FT, anything but a Tory. He issued this tweet last night:

 Sebastian Payne  @SebastianEPayne · 12h ...
Minister on why masks were scrapped: "Colleagues have reached the end of their tether with restrictions. We couldn't have got [restrictions] through on Tory votes and there's no way we could have passed with Labour. It would have been the end of Boris."

Masks are a small price to pay in avoiding another England lock...
Parliamentary arithmetic may have forced Boris Johnson into his decision to drop restrictions but he should reconsider

The message is loud and clear,. The right-wing of the Tory party want to end Covid restrictions without caring for the consequences. The government knows that this is madness, but will not rely on Labour votes to retain masks. And so, to save Boris Johnson masks must go, even if (as will happen) thousand will die as a result.

This is democide in action.

I just hope that people realise when cases rise very rapidly, as they are now going to do.
