

If the police at No 10 can give damning evidence to Sue...

This is from the front page of the Telegraph today:

One source said last night: "Met officers have spoken to Sue Gray now, as you would expect, and have been able to provide a lot of information."

Asked how significant the material they had disclosed was, the source added: "Put it this way, if Boris Johnson is still Prime Minister by the end of the week, I'd be very surprised."

Scotland Yard has come under fire for refusing to launch a criminal investigation into allegations of parties taking place in Downing Street in contravention of Covid regulations.

But sources have said the officers on duty in Downing Street have "nothing to hide" and their testimony is beyond reproach.

So, there were police officers on duty at the time that parties took place in Number 10.

And their evidence is damning.

What is more, they are quite happy to talk about it.

Except that it, it seems, to their superiors in the Met who refuse to ask them about it.

Once Johnson has gone - as surely he will be - then the clear out of the Met has to start next. Having evidence of crimes and not acting upon it is, surely, a crime when you are a police officer?

Something stinks here and if the police are to recover from this then serious change has to happen. Nothing less will do.
