It was inevitable that there would be a backlash against net zero.

It was also inevitable it would come from the far right. Isobel Oakeshott highlighted the fact that it is in a tweet yesterday:

Isobel Oakeshott

Net Zero will cost hundreds of billions and affect all our lives. It requires a proper debate and referendum. Revealed today that @Nigel_Farage and @TiceRichard are launching a new cross party campaign on this issue. Bring it on.

As far as I know, she still lives with Richard Tice.

She also forgets to mention that she has acknowledged that whilst she thinks these two were innocent of taking Russian money she thinks that the Brexit campaign in which they were involved did do so.

So the question has to be asked as to who is funding this campaign which plays straight into the hands of Russia as a major oil and gas producer at this precise moment?

When the world at large has realised that we need to break our dependency on oil as fast as possible, Farage, Tice and Oakeshott argue the exact opposite. To ask who is funding them to do so seems to be the minimum demand we can make of them right now.

And I very strongly suggest that unless very clear answers are given they should not be platformed. If we think that transparency is key to beating corruption now the same rule should be applied to all think tanks and campaigns who want to access the media. Say who funds you, or don't get on should be the message.

I have always made clear who funds me.
