Both my sons are home this weekend, having travelled by train from their respective universities yesterday.

By coincidence, I happened yesterday to read a short story by the poet Steve Pottinger about observing the realities of the human condition on a station concourse. It had the title 'Love and Coats'. The beautifully crafted story is here.

Steve reads it in his own distinctive style here:

I really do not think you will regret listening.

I asked Steve's permission to share this. He agreed, adding:

I wrote it a few years back, while waiting for a train at Euston and watching what was going on....

If only a few more people watched the world as carefully as Steve does.
