

A break

I have a pile of work to finish today with my Sheffield colleague, Prof Andrew Baker. With luck it will be done by this evening. He has already delivered way beyond his required contribution on it over the last ten days.

And then, I admit, I am going to accept the advice provided here about Covid. I have, this week at least, worked through it and I am now feeling the consequences. So I will be taking a bit of a break, because to continue to work would not be wise.

I am planning a few days off to go nowhere, but rest. Moderation will also be achy. Sorry, but I think it necessary.
