Couldn't we do a little quiet or even silent mourning...

I posted this on Twitter this morning:

Can the media really keep talking to people in the queue to Westminster Hall for the next four days? Hasn't enough been said now?

I understand grief.

I get the need to mourn.

But do we need to be infantilised by continual television coverage of nothing much happening as we wait for the funeral?

The whole absurdity that anyone who has lived through such a period in their own lives knows is that normal life has to carry on whilst suffering all the emotions around the death of a loved one. That is one of the many paradoxes that living requires we embrace.

Couldn't we see that reflected in the media for a few days now?
