Regular commentator Robin Stafford recommended this edition of Steve Keen's podcast. It takes some concentration, but the explanations are, as usual from Steve, very strong. Worth a listen:

*How widespread is the idea that one person's debt is another person's credit and therefore has no impact on the economy. What are the implications of this thinking and what changes when the realisation that the banking sector is also involved and so is the relative velocity of money in different hands. If we accepted that debt and credit don't always cancel each other out how would that change the approach of governments and the monetary policy of Central Banks? Hosted on Acast.
