The Guardian has a headline this morning that says:

FTSE 100 hits fresh all-time high as inflation and recession fears ease

Index rises to 7934.30, pushing it above previous record set on 3 February

It has another that declares:

Act now on energy bills subsidy or see fuel poverty surge, says Martin Lewis

Jeremy Hunt urged to reconsider raising state-subsidised energy rate from April as market prices make delay affordable

How can these headlines be reconciled? That is easy. What they portray is a broken country where some are enjoying considerable wealth generated at cost to the majority in its population.

It is impossible for me to believe that this situation is now sustainable unless, of course, representative government is suppressed. I cannot see how most people will continue to put up with this. And nor should they.

We live in a broken, divided and profoundly unfair society. Any politician should now be saying so whilst laying out their programme to tackle the gross inequalities that now divide us.
