In The National this morning I argue that Scotland is the potential new renewable powerhouse of Europe, but that:

The Scottish renewable sector can only thrive and deliver at its best when the motivation for developing this industry, the management of it and the method of its operation can be aligned. That will only be possible in an independent Scotland.

Scotland can be an energy powerhouse, but not within the Union. Scotland has to be independent to lead the way in renewable energy.

The National does not have a paywall this week. You can read the full article here.
