

Braverman, out of step

As the Guardian notes in its morning comment email:

Thousands of Britons should be trained to drive trucks, work in the meat industry and gather crops rather than filling vacancies with foreign workers, Suella Braverman will tell Conservative activists on Monday. With the government bracing for a record increase in net migration figures later this month, the home secretary's intervention will be seen as a rebuff to cabinet calls for an easing of visa rules.

After a weekend of the Conservative Democratic Organisation conference, today we have the start of another three-day jamboree from another far-right faction within the Tories.

Braverman gave the CDO conference a miss, but it looks like many of the names from the weekend will appear for a second outing. Jacob Rees-Mogg opens the show.

But what is the significance of Braverman's showing up? It is that Subnak cannot even keep control of his holders of the principal offices of state. That's not good.

Nor is Braverman's message likely to go down well with anyone outside the far-right of the Tories. After a weekend of decidedly woke television (Eurovision and the Baftas, both being heavily political) her message of isolation and of increased limits on immigration really does seem very out of step with the country.

Although, no doubt, those on the Tory far-right will simply say that this is evidence that Gary Lineker really is in control of the fate of everything and everyone, except that of Leicester City, of course.
