Goebbels' advice, when it came to propaganda, was to accuse your enemies of that which you were actually doing.

The Guardian seems to be drawing attention to this ploy from the National Socialists Conservatives this morning when publishing this in their morning newsletter:

Good morning from the heart of the tradition-wrecking, history-hating, white-marginalising, slavery-weaponising, penis-misattributing, anonymously tweeting, culturally Marxist, vandalistic, narcissistic, paganistic, children's-soul-destroying, anti-marriage, overpopulated, under-reproductive, suicide-inducing, totally normal society of excess that is Britain.

Not my views, to be clear, but those of the speakers at the National Conservatism conference in London that ended last night. A number of them are senior Tory MPs, and they seem to find very little to like about this country. They also say that you're the one that hates it.

We are, apparently, the haters of society, and yet it is they who seem entirely driven by hate.

And it is not just notorious figures like David Starkey or utterly distasteful backbenchers like Miriam Cates MP who are saying this. I noted this of Michael Gove:

 Richard Murphy  @RichardJMurphy · 10h ...
Totally Goebbelian: accusing the left of doing exactly what Gove knows the Tories do.

 Paul Waugh @paulwaugh · May 16
. @michaelgove tells the @NatConTalk conference that "the Left polarises" people "into 'woke' and 'unwoke'". "Conservatives don't do that."

Gave said the exact opposite of what is true. The term 'woke' might have originated on the left, but it is now almost entirely used by the right, and I am certain he knows that.

The march of the Tories to the far-right continues, unabated.

When will Starmer realise he has the duty to address this and to prevent them (at least in this form) ever getting power again, instead of following in their wake?
