

Would PR change who you voted for tomorrow?

In the light of local elections taking place in some parts of England tomorrow, and discussion on proportional representation on this blog, I was curious to know if PR would change voting intentions. I am not pretending any poll here is statistically valid, but they tend to be interesting.

So, three polls this morning. The first is on what you would vote for as your first preference if you had the chance to do so tomorrow and PR was in use, meaning you could rank your preference of your candidates.

[poll id="57"]

Then I want to know who your second preference would be in that situation:

[poll id="58"]

Then, assuming that we did not have a PR system, who would you vote for?

[poll id="59"]

As far as I know I cannot identify who votes in these polls, and I would never do so.

My interest is in whether behaviour changes, or not.
