The FT noted this yesterday afternoon:

The UK's top financial regulator is investigating Odey Asset Management, the hedge fund firm whose founder Crispin Odey is facing more than a dozen accusations of sexual assault and harassment, people familiar with the situation told the Financial Times.

Let me be clear: an investigation is not proof of guilt, and I am not suggesting that there is any such thing here.

But what I do note is something very significant. The idea that power may not be challenged does appear to be coming to an end. The patriarchs of neoliberalism appeared to think that they were above scrutiny. What is becoming clear is that this is no longer the case. Those with power are being stripped of their illusions that money buys immunity, if nothing else. The world will be a better place for that.
