Most days someone makes a donation on this blog by hitting the 'buy me a coffee' button. I am genuinely grateful: this blog costs money as well as a lot of time to run.

I also do, I admit, consume more than my fair share of coffee. Most afternoons right now you can find me in the garden of the Poets House Hotel in Ely (they say there is no apostrophe) with a coffee, a computer, an iPad and a phone to hand:

This tends to be where the serious writing of the day gets done. Right now that means work on a new report on wealth taxes - and their capacity to provide the additional tax revenues that our economy needs. To be published in stages, I hope to explore all aspects of this issue and to provide a menu of options with which to challenge any politician who says 'there is no money left', because there most certainly is.
