It's the sort of morning that can only happen after a long summer, before a bank holiday weekend (in England and Wales) and when almost nothing is happening politically. It's also the sort of morning that happens before a weekend of family-linked events. So, for an alternative Friday of blogging, I am doing polls.

This one is on Trump. He was charged with yet more felonies overnight. Despite that, he remains the likely GOP presidential candidate, although even US polls suggest that this popularity may tumble if he is found guilty of crimes - with that looking to be increasingly possible as his trial dates appear, of anything, to be sooner rather than later now, despite his appeals for delay.

So, three questions:
