

Progress is delayed

I am aware of the time, not quite delivering as I would want on this blog at present.

New papers in the Taxing Wealth Report series are not coming out as often as I would wish. I have now run out of those that I was working on before publication began.

I have not had time to edit a couple of contributions that I have received.

Moderation is sometimes slower than I would want.

All I can do, is apologise for the fact that I have a substantial amount of work on, and something has to give.

Right now I am working on:

- * A major academic grant application.
- * Data for a new academic paper, whilst also contributing to a couple more as co-author.
- * Increased media demand because of the Taxing Wealth Report (I am in London, recording, today).
- * A paper on the future direction of tax justice.

Discussions with Molly Scott Cato from the Green Party have also made good progress: I think we have a meeting of minds.

And routine commitments continue.

As a result please forgive delays. Everything will get done in the end, but many things I would like to do seem constrained by an absence of time right now. Such is life.
