There was discussion on the SNP's new strategy for independence on Debate Night last night. The BBC clipped this contribution from me:

As was apparent, this went down well with some in the audience. Some told me so afterwards. I clearly kept some people happy.

As is also clear from Twitter reaction, it did not go down well with everyone. The colonisers do not like being named. It's a characteristic of the breed.

I am happy with the choice of language and the provocation implicit in it.

I hope the SNP rises to the challenge. It will have to change a lot of its thinking to do so, from abandoning neoliberalism to embracing a Scottish currency straight after independence, if it is to do so.
