This is from the Guardian this morning:

World leaders must “stop dawdling and start doing” on carbon emission cuts, as rapidly rising temperatures this year have put everyone on the frontline of disaster, the UN’s top climate official has warned.

You would never have known that from this week’s Autumn Statement.

You would never know that from the Labour Party’s reaction, and its apparent abandonment of its green spending plans.

Both the Tories and Labour think keeping markets happy much more important than the impending climate disaster that those markets are still funding.

When will we get the change that we need?
