

How long has Sunak got?

There is a headline in the Observer today that says:

Tories warn Rishi Sunak that his Rwanda plan 'will never be law'

As Tuesday's crucial vote looms, MPs from both wings of the party say PM has tied his future to a bill that cannot succeed

It seems clear that large numbers of Tories have decided that Sunak's Rwanda plan is either too extreme to be credible or not nearly extreme enough to pander to their prejudices, and either way it is lacking in support.

No wonder Sunak's main line of argument for this plan is to say that Labour have no alternative and so they must support it. For reasons that stress hard to explain, he has pinned his hopes for his future in winning the support of the Opposition for a Bill that makes no sense to any right thinking person.

So, is Rishi doomed as soon as Tuesday?

I think what happens on Monday at the Covid inquiry might have a big impact on that. If he is eviscerated for 'Eat out to help out' - as he should be - and 20,000 deaths are laid at his door - as they should be - his chance's of winning on Tuesday diminish considerably.

But I should add that according to the Mail this morning, the plan is to then bring back Boris Johns9on, aided and abetted by Farage. They do not seem to have noticed that neither is in parliament, but since when did a little thing like democracy get in the way of the Mail?
