

Funding the Future

The Tories face being wiped out by the TCP ( the Tory C...

Published: January 13, 2026, 12:34 pm

The Telegraph features a constituency-based opinion poll of 14,000 people conducted by YouGov, funded by unknown Tory supporters, this morning that predicts that the election result would be as follows:

If a general election was held tomorrow, what would the electoral map of Britain look like?

See how each constituency would vote, according to YouGov

Conservative Green Labour Liberal Democrats SNP Plaid Cymru

Search for a constituency

The article does not appear to be behind the usual Telegraph paywall.

These are what the Telegraph think the important results, but with the impact of Reform show:

Reform could hand Labour a majority

Estimated number of seats with Reform standing and if Reform votes went to the Conservatives at next election

With Reform Without Reform

WORKING MAJORITY (320)

It is suggested that the SNP will fall to 25 seats.

The Reform impact is interesting. It shows that in a first-past-the-post system, bizarre outcomes arise. But will the Tories listen and support PR? I doubt it.

What I do not recall doubt is that sometime in the next twelve months, the TCP (Tory Continuity Party), sometimes called LINO (Labour In Name Only), will win a general election, and the ethos of neoliberal government will roll onward, as destructive as it has been for decades.