

Might we never see the like of Theresa May again?

Theresa May is retiring. Thank heavens, I thought. Apparently not everyone agreed.

So, I struggled to recall her achievements.

She once called the Tories the Nasty Party. That was, I think, the high spot.

She was a hideous, cruel, and in my opinion, racist Home Secretary who sought to divide society over migration with her ‘Go home’ vans.

She replaced Cameron without a vote eventually being required, but then her opponent until she withdrew was Andrea Leadsom.

She was a worse Prime Minister than David Cameron, with her reputation only salvaged by those who have come since.

She said ‘Brexit meant Brexit’ and no one has ever known what she meant. All we know was that it did destroy her career.

She thought Nicholas Timothy was worth relying on. She called a general election at his suggestion. She lost badly and bunged £1 billion at Ulster Unionist politicians to survive in office.

Her party rightly got rid of her.

And throughout all this no-one had the slightest idea why she was a politician, because she had neither the wit to work out what that reason was or the ability to explain it.

But in that sense she really was a true Tory. Believing in anything but greed and their right to both govern and to simultaneously be nasty seems to be beyond them.

Could it be that their time has come? May’s has, and I sincerely hope that she does not go to the Lords. It would be great if we never saw her sort again.
