I posted this on Twitter yesterday.

A screenshot of a Twitter post by Richard Murphy (@RichardJMurphy). The post text reads: "I have had to speak to at least five healthcare professionals in the NHS in the last 24 hours. Judging from their accents I suspect three might be first generation migrants to the UK. They got me sorted. Migrants are helping solve the crisis in the NHS. They are not creating it." The post shows a timestamp of 13:46 on 11/08/2024, 103K views, and engagement metrics of 588 reposts, 40 quotes, 2.2K likes, and 12 bookmarks. There is also a link to view analytics.

There's not a lot to add, except my thanks to all involved. I hope I communicated that to all involved.

What I did not do is apologise for any stress the people in question - and throughout the NHS - might be suffering. I should have done. The atmosphere of fear that the far-right are trying to create is utterly unacceptable. I hope there is widespread revulsion at their actions expressed whenever possible now.
