The Telegraph has issued an email this morning that states:

Ed Miliband's claim that net zero will create hundreds of thousands industrial jobs is vastly overstated, Sir Tony Blair's think tank has warned.

The Tony Blair Institute for Global Change (TBI) said investing in green technology was unlikely to reverse the long-term decline of British industry and warned that ministers must not "over-state the job opportunities from green manufacturing".

The think tank added that it was a "mistake" to let net zero dominate the Government's entire economic strategy as it would deliver only a meagre boost to growth. It said: "It must be a pillar of the UK's growth strategy, but it cannot be the whole strategy."

The related article is to be found here.

The whole framing of this issue - including no doubt by the Tony Blair Institute, who I am quite sure hate Ed Miliband and anything to do with the Green agenda - is deliberate.

They want growth to let the wealthier get wealthier - which is the only success criteria that Tony Blair now knows.

They like to pretend that growth is the pre-requisite for supplying better public services, which is their current chosen metaphor for trickle-down economics, which we know never has and never will deliver benefit for any person other than the global elite - of which Blair was always so desperate to be a part- because wealth always gushes upwards when this philosophy is espoused, and none goes downwards.

And we know that none of these people - from Blair to the Telegraph journalists - accept the science of climate change because the denial of science is a necessary condition for their acceptance by the far-right, who loathe everything about its rationality.

In reality, net zero has to be the epicentre of strategy for one very simple reason. Nothing else guarantees our survival. It is as simple and straightforward as that.

No ism can prevent climate change.

No think-tank talking nonsense will halt its advance.

The Telegraph and all like it can protest all they like, but the flood waters will sweep them away just as they will the rest of us unless action is taken.

It is action that matters, as I seem to keep finding myself saying.

And it is inaction that the likes of Blair perpetually propose. They will always do so, provided that inaction delivers for them the dopamine hit that an ever-bigger figure for their own personal wealth creates.

This is the battle we are in. It is action versus inaction that now matters. Everything else is a sideshow. The sideshows might be fun, but only that action matters.
