The German election result is grim, but 80 per cent did…

One in five people in Germany who voted in today's election voted for an openly fascist party that has sought to deny the significance of the holocaust, amongst other troubling things.

It's quite likely there might be a similar result in the U.K. right now, and I see little difference between Farage with his support for the fascists in the USA and the AfD, the German fascist party.

There are three ways of looking at this. One is to live in fear of a situation that can result in so many people voting for fascism.

Another is to lament the utter failure of supposed social democrats to deliver anything of value, giving rise to this situation.

Third, there is the fact to cling on to that eighty per cent did not vote fascist, and fifty per cent did not even vote right wing. Not all is lost, although the situation really does not feel good.

As I keep saying, the job is to work out what to do. I promise, that is what I am working on.
