When I looked at the photos I took yesterday, I discovered that plants and flowers stood out:

We grow dandelions in our back garden. The Sony autofocus did exactly what I wanted in this case. I chose to shoot it with lots of bokeh, with the aim of achieving the softness around the image. The centre is sharp.

Just above the dandelion is ceanaothus:

As well as sage and hebe, only one of which is for the pot:

And I am not sure whether I like this or not. I'm playing with Adobe Lightroom to learn just what it can do. PSR, on this blog, encouraged me to do so. Nature (at Welney) provided the natural colour palette:
