

Might Trump fail soon?

Simon Tisdall had this to say in The Observer this morning:

Measured by willingness and capacity to harm the world's poorest and most vulnerable, wreak global economic mayhem and threaten nuclear annihilation, Trump is uniquely dangerous – and ever more so by the day.

Unsurprisingly, given comments that I have made of late around the theme that he addresses in his article, which is how the tyranny of Trump might come to an end, I agree with him.

However, what worries me as I scan the news today is just how many people in the UK are likely to vote for someone who is Trump adjacent. Farage shares much in common with Trump and is supposedly the most popular political leader in the UK at present, even though almost every policy he promotes would deliver considerable harm to those who seem to support him, just as is the case with Trump.

Is it entirely selfish to hope that Trump crashes so soon that the rest of us might be saved from having to suffer a similar fate?
