

Starmer is destroying the NHS

From The Telegraph this morning:

Almost half of foreign nurses plan to quit Sir Keir Starmer's Britain because of its "hostile" immigration policy, a report has revealed.

More than 55,000 international NHS nurses want to move away, a survey revealed, raising the prospect of a staffing crisis across the health service and social care.

Some 42 per cent blamed racism and Britain's unwelcoming attitude towards foreigners for wanting to leave the country amid the Prime Minister's planned crackdown on immigration.

Who can blame them? Starmer is creating a hostile environment for migrants. They will notice, as he clearly wants them to. His dog-whistling vilification is done for a reason.

There is just one problem. As The Telegraph also notes:

Nearly a quarter of all nurses working in the NHS are trained overseas and half of all nurses newly joining the UK nursing register in recent years have come from abroad.

So, without them, we have no NHS.

Is Starmer capable of joined-up thinking? His migration policy is about to destroy the NHS, and he appears unaware of that. How can that be?
