

Fauna

Published: January 15, 2026, 9:13 am

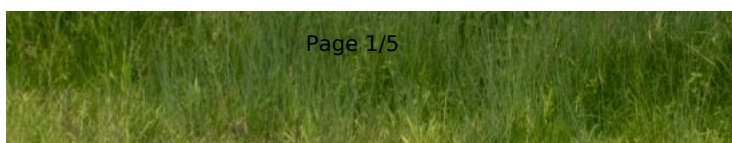

---

In this second part of my posts on this weekend's photos, I turn to wildlife.

The heron family were out in force. This is the grey heron:

This is the little egret, which is half the size of a grey heron:

And this is the great white egret, which is becoming increasingly common around here, and is grey heron size:

Breeding was happening. The intention of these hares is pretty obvious:

This swallow had mouths to feed:

Those mouths, to be precise. There was a third chick in there as well:

There were warblers everywhere. This was a great whitethroat, caught in outline. The picture is underexposed, but I decided I liked it. As with almost all warblers you have seconds, at best, to get shots of these:

A sedge warbler was more obliging. It gave me maybe 10 seconds:

And then it came back:

Black-tailed godwits were struggling to find water to wade in:

And then two shots taken on the bridge into the reserve at Welney on different days.
First, a collared dove:

And second, a pied wagtail, which obviously love this structure:

And finally, a cinnibar moth - which is stunningly beautiful, but I failed to capture it with its wings open:

