

Funding the Future

Article URL

<https://www.taxresearch.org.uk/Blog/2025/06/10/inspiration-2/>

Published: January 12, 2026, 6:16 pm

I was out, thinking, yesterday.

I never have a problem coming up with ideas. My problem is having a surfeit of them (all the time; they never stop flowing) and then deciding what to concentrate on.

Now I have a little more time, I sometimes go out for a walk to address this issue, because I find that walking helps me marshal my thoughts, work out priorities and decide on plans.

Combining walks with time to mindmap on my iPad, and to even turn ideas into immediate actions (a glossary entry for extreme centrism being an example of that, yesterday afternoon) is highly productive for me.

It also gives some time for photography, as well. I got nothing worth sharing when it came to birds or other fauna yesterday, so it was the abundance of flowers that were seen to which I turned my attention.

The wild roses were stunning:

This is another rose:

This is apparently a member of the geranium family, called Herb Robert:

And this is a bramble flower, but you can't deny its beauty.

And a foxglove growing wild has a lot to commend it:

And from all this came ideas on videos and more on wealth and bonds. But give me time...these will take some more planning as yet.