

Miracles happen

As Nils Pratley (not my favourite financial commentator) says in The Guardian this morning:

It's a miracle. Babcock International, the defence contractor with a specialism in kitting out the UK's nuclear submarines, has emerged from the depths. After about half a decade in which the story was mostly about cost overruns, acquisition indigestion, accounting woes, pension deficits and too much debt, Babcock is suddenly back in the FTSE 100 index and is a hot stock. The share price has more than doubled this year.

Look at the share price:

Putin could not boost Babcock.

The Tories failed it.

But bring on Starmer and look what happens. Nothing short of a miracle.

What was it that President Dwight Eisenhower said in his retirement speech in 1961?
This, I think:

In the councils of government, we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex.

Starmer has entirely forgotten that decidedly sound advice from a Republican President who commanded Allied forces in Europe in 1944 and 1945.

Why did he do that, I wonder?
