

The Taxing Wealth Report 2024 in The Guardian

There are moments when any writer wonders whether anyone but their friends and family is taking a lot of notice. I admit that social media data provides me with some reassurance on this issue, but it was still interesting to note that the Taxing Wealth Report is still getting attention from Guardian writers.

Polly Toynbee had this to say earlier this week:

Making all forms of income pay the same tax, earned or capital gains, rents or self-employed, pays out £12bn, says the economist Prof Richard Murphy.

And Larry Elliot also noted its existence yesterday:

But there are other options. ... Limiting pension tax relief to the basic rate of income tax – as suggested by the tax expert Richard Murphy – is another. But no matter what Reeves chooses, she needs to start making the case now that you can't get better public services on the cheap.

That this still contributes to debate is useful. No one else has tried anything like it.
