

A new party? Maybe?

As The Guardian notes this morning:

MP Zarah Sultana, suspended from Labour, has announced she is resigning from the party to join Jeremy Corbyn's Independent Alliance.

Sultana declared she will "co-lead the founding of a new party" - even though, while there was an agreement in principle to form one, the timing and leadership had not been settled, the Guardian understands.

I think Zarah Sultana is very committed and able. I think there is potential support - maybe considerable available support - for a new party. My problem is the confusion that is obviously surrounding this announcement. It does not augur well. And until I am sure what is going on and what this party is all about, I am not sure what to say about this development.

What I do note is this on the Action Network:

Join Team Zarah

We don't have billionaire donors or press baron friends. That's why we need your support.

Wherever you live, join our team to fight for a brighter future.

However, I cannot be sure that is endorsed by Zarah Sultana.

The confusion is unfortunate.

Reliable news would be good.
