Ipsos Mori put out a poll yesterday, about which they noted:

One in five (20%) British adults would consider voting for a new left-wing party founded by Jeremy Corbyn and Zarah Sultana. The party's appeal is strongest among young people, with one-third (33%) of 16-34s considering it, alongside a third of 2024 Labour voters (33%) and 43% of 2024 Green Party voters.

The data was as follows, assuming no alliance between a new party and the Greens:

This is the data if it was assumed there were to be an alliance between the Greens and this new party, making the chance of winning in first-past-the-post elections very much more likely:

Labour would be massively damaged, is the message.

The combined support might well challenge Farage.

Now, of course, this is an opinion poll. I know all the risks of extrapolation. But the message is clear: there is hunger for a left-wing alternative in our society that requires a response, and it is not going to get it from Labour at present.
