

What flag would I fly?

My comment on flags yesterday attracted attention. I was asked to discuss it on Times Radio last night, but it was too late, and I felt I was too tired to do the subject justice, so I declined.

An interesting comment did come in this morning, though, from a commentator called Joanna, who said, and I have edited slightly:

Were I in the UK now, here's my suggestion. Don't just sit there pretending nothing is awry - fly something. Say your piece, give your response. A dove. A multicoloured family holding hands. Something you believe in.

Here is my response:

Where am I from?

Earth.

One planet. Populated by people, all with common ancestors, and all related, and all of whom have a duty to share this place so that we might, in common, survive.

Earth is where I live.

Earth hosts the human population that matters, and for whom I have concern.

Earth is what unites us.

Earth, and all it is, has been, and might be, and all and everything upon it: that is what I care for.

That would be my flag.
