A Guardian headline this morning says:

Labour's new deputy leader says party must pay more heed to its members

Powell, who was sacked as Commons leader by Starmer in September, says government should stop trying to 'out-Reform Reform'

However, the news is that Starmer has no intention of giving Lucy Powell a job back in the Cabinet. She might be deputy leader of the party - which made Angela Rayner deputy prime minister - but Powell is to be left on the back benches in an act clearly intended to send a defiant signal to those in Labour who oppose what Starmer is trying to do.

It really does seem that Starmer has only one goal, which is the destruction of the Labour Party. If so, he's very good at it. The trouble is, he shows no talent for absolutely anything else.
