

People want democratic control of the City and money

Yesterday's video on 12 questions on MMT had a poll linked to it, which was not reproduced on this blog (my mistake).

This was the poll and the results:

I know all the arguments about this not being representative, and that the questions are not comprehensive, but I do think that the massive vote in favour of government control is surprising and suggests that there would be considerable enthusiasm for any political party that:

- * Suggested state control of the Bank of England
- * Limited the power of private banks

At the very least, there is an appetite for reform. Any politician ignoring that would be making a serious mistake: people want democratic control of the City and money. And why shouldn't they? After all, money creation is one of the reserved powers of the state. It should exercise it better.
