

Labour fourth, the LibDems fifth and the Tories sixth: ...

As The National reports this morning:

Reform UK are set to become Holyrood's second party as the SNP remains the dominant force in Scottish politics, according to a fresh poll on voting intention.

The Find Out Now poll, commissioned exclusively by The National, projected that the SNP would win 36% of the constituency vote, with Reform UK in second - but 15 points behind - on 21%. Labour polled at 12%, the Greens 10%, the LibDems 9%, and the Tories 7%. Alba scored 2%.

The charts look like this (the left-hand column is the constituency support and the right-hand column the regional support under the Scottish PR system):

The SNP will be near a majority in Holyrood with this support. With Green support, they will be governing again.

Reform's support is worrying, but contained, although having them as the Opposition is not good. However, the accountability will be deeply uncomfortable for them.

And note this:

- * Labour is fourth
- * The LibDems are fifth
- * The Tories are sixth

Scotland is rejecting the mainstream parties of England.

Unsurprisingly, polling also shows majority support for independence, again.

The times, they are a-changin'.
