

Work is the curse of the social media classes

Please accept my apologies for the slowness in moderation today. There are two very good reasons for this.

One is that lots of you commented, not that I am complaining.

The other is that sometimes managing all the demands on my time creates a little pressure. Not only did we have a very busy recording session this morning, but I also had meetings and a pile of emails to deal with. That was on top of six blog posts, one LinkedIn post, and a Substack post, although the last two are very largely James's work now.

This afternoon, I have three videos to review, Thomas having edited them. Otherwise, there will not be videos between now and Monday morning, and although he does a great job, I always want to make sure that I am happy with everything, and usually make a few tweaks before the thing goes out, whilst also creating the blog post for use here from the transcript at the same time.

If I wanted a quiet retirement, I most definitely went the wrong way about this.

And if you are also wondering why I did, as a result, write this additional blog post, that was written by dictating it into my phone as I walked to get a coffee at a regular destination where they are used to seeing me sitting with a pair of headphones on, watching and listening to myself as edits progress.
