

In the Echo Chamber

As if one podcast were not enough for a morning, let me offer you a second one. On this occasion, I am the guest on the ironically named Echo Chamber podcast produced by my friend, Tony Groves, in Ireland.

Tony's position on most issues is radical, compassionate and intensely humane, which is why I enjoy our conversations, and why his podcast has so many active listeners in Ireland. We are not in total agreement on all issues, I am sure, but that is a strength rather than a weakness, and I think our mutual respect is apparent from the discussions that we have had.

In this edition of the podcast, which was recorded late last week, we look at the consequences of the current wartime situation, and as he put it in the podcast title, societal resilience in a wartime economy.
